VEIN. n. f. [veine, French; vena, Lat.]

1. The coats of the veins are the same with those of the arteries, only the muscular coat is as thin in all the veins as it is in the capillary arteries, the pressure of the blood against the sides of the veins being less than that against the sides of the arteries. In the veins there is no pulse, because the blood is thrown into them with a continued stream, and because it moves from a narrow channel to a wider. The capillary veins unite with one another, as the capillary arteries. In all the veins perpendicular to the horizon, excepting those of the [illegible] and of the porta, are small membranes or valves; like so many half thimbles stuck to the side of the veins, with their [illegible] towards the heart. UN. A Saxon privative or negative particle anſwering to in of the Latins, and α of the Greeks, on Dutch. It is placed almoſt at will before adjectives and adverbs. All the inſtances of this kind of compoſition cannot therefore be inſerted; but I have collected a number ſufficient, perhaps more than ſufficient, to explain it.

The examples however, though numerous, might have eaſily been made more; for almoſt every adjective has a ſubſtantive and an adverb adhering to it, as unfaithful, unfaithfulneſs, unfaithfully. Un is prefixed to adjectives with their derivatives, as unapt, unaptneſs, unaptly; and to paſſive participles, as hurt, unhurt; favoured, unfavoured: it is prefixed likewiſe to participial adjectives, as pleaſing, unpleaſing, but rarely in the verbal form expreſſing action, we cannot ſay, the dart flew unwounding, though we ſay, the man eſcaped unwounded. In and im may be thus diſtinguiſhed: To words merely Engliſh we prefix un, as unfit; to words borrowed in the poſitive form, but made negative by ourſelves, we prefix in, as generous, ungenerous. When we borrow both words, we retain the Latin or French in, as elegant, inelegant; politick, impolitick. Before ſubſtantives, if they have the Engliſh termination neſs, it is proper to prefix un, as unfitneſs; ungraciouſneſs: If they have the Latin or French terminations in tude, ice, or ence, and for the moſt part if they end in ty, the negative in is put before them, as unapt, unaptneſs, inaptitude, unjuſt, injuſtice; imprudence; unfaithful, unfaithfulneſs, infidelity.

WA'TER. n. s. [waeter, Dutch; pater, Saxon.]

1. Sir Isaac Newton defines water, when pure, to be a very fluid salt, volatile, and void of all savour or taste; and it seems to consist of small, smooth, hard, porous, spherical particles, of equal diameters, and of equal specifick gravities, as Dr. Cheyne observes; and also that there are between them spaces so large, and ranged in such a manner, as to be pervious on all sides. Their smoothness accounts for their sliding easily over one another's surfaces; their sphericity keeps them also from touching one another in more points than one; and by both these their friction in sliding over one another is rendered the least possible. Their hardness accounts for the incompressibility of water, when it is free from the intermixture of air. The porosity of water is so very great, that there is at least forty times as much space as matter in it; for water is nineteen times specifically lighter than gold, and consequently rarer in the same proportion. Quincy.

Now in that year, before the news came down of duke Hamilton's defeat, the ministers animated their people to rise and march to Edinburgh; and they came up marching at the head of their parishes with an unheard of fury, praying and preaching all the way as they came. The marquis of Argyle and his party came and headed them, they being about six thousand. This was called the whiggamors inroad; and, ever after that, all that opposed the court came in contempt to be called whigs, and from Scotland the word was brought into England, where it is now one of our unhappy terms of disunion. Burnet.

A ſpirit zealous, as he ſeem'd, to know
More of the Almighty's works. Milton.

We ſhould be not only devout towards God, but zealous towards men; endeavouring by all prudent means to recover them out of thoſe ſnares of the devil, whereby they are taken captive. Decay of Piety

It is not at all good to be zealous againſt any perſon, but only againſt their crimes. It is better to be zealous for things that are ſerious; but then it ſhould be only for good things: a rule that does certainly exclude all manner of zeal for all things, all manner of zeal for little things. Spratt.

Being inſtructed only in the general, and zealous in the main deſign, and as haute beings not admitted into the ſecrets of government, the laſt reaſons of providence, or capable of diſcovering the final purpoſes of God, they muſt be ſometimes ignorant of the means conducing to thoſe ends in which alone they can ſee each other Dryden

Peter thus ſaved himſelf, he may be zealous in the ſalvation of ſouls. Law.

2. A diviſion of the earth.

The whole ſurface of the earth is divided into five zones; the firſt is contained between the two tropicks, and is called the torrid zone. There are two temperate zones, and two frigid zones. The northern temperate zone is terminated by the tropick of Cancer and the arctick polar circle: the ſouthern temperate zone is contained between the tropick of Capricorn and the polar circle: the frigid zones are circumſcribed by the polar circles, and the poles are in their centers.

True love is ſtill the ſame; the torrid zones
And thoſe more frigid ones,
It muſt not know:
For love grown cold or hot,
Is luſt or friendſhip, not
The thing we ſhow:
For that's a flame would die,
Held down or up too high:
Then think I love more than I can expreſs,
And would love more, could I but love leſs. Suckling.
